

The algorithm used to generate this koch snowflake involves the queue data structure. Initially the queue holds the 3 line segments that creates the initial triangle. We represent line segments as an array of 2 vec2 objects. Depending on the variable iterations, line segments are popped and four more are calculated and pushed into the queue. A rotation function is defined in helping to calculate the line segments.

